BOOK REVIEWS

The narrative of this book begins in the Minbu area of central Burma in 1952. Spiritual guides, long since passed from the present life, arrived to speak and teach mindfulness through the medium of living people. These particular wizzars, “accomplished masters,” were location specific, coming from Nagama Mountain, a place accessible only to the adept, west of Minbu. A key focus of this “dhatsii-ing,” channelling, was Htun Yin, described as a simple, penniless man. Hoping to get a cure for a stomach ailment, he had met a monk and a person in white robes, wizzars as it turned out, who offered him a cure if he would agree to help propagate the teachings of Buddha by letting them use him as a medium. Some “fragrant and tasty” medicine restored him to health. Several days later at his home village of Mebegon, a few kilometres north of Minbu, he delivered his first talk, in which the wizzar explained to the assembled villagers “Htun Yin is like a radio and I am like a broadcasting station.” At subsequent gatherings rosary beads floated in the air, fruit and statues appeared from nowhere. The wizzars at times appeared in person under circumstances that mystified all present.

Htun Yin reportedly went for several years eating nothing but “fruit and an occasional cup of coffee” provided by the wizzars. In 1973 he left his family and was ordained a monk with the religious name U Tillaw Keinda. His devotees built him a monastery. In 1975, and again in 1989, complex “transformation by fire” ceremonies were held in “man-made caves of victory” at the Mebegon monastery to further prolong the lives of two of the visiting wizzars, U Pandita, a monk born in AD 1256, who had already prolonged his life by alchemy, and U Uttamakyaw, born in AD 1453, who had prolonged his life by a knowledge of magical diagrams. The monastery continues to draw devotees and pilgrims.

1 Views, opinions, and other content of the book reviews are those of the individual reviewers only and do not necessarily reflect those of the editor, the editorial board, or the international advisory board of the SOAS Bulletin of Burma Research or of the School of Oriental and African Studies.
This account in English of a contemporary wizzar cult has been translated from Burmese and edited by a Spanish-born Buddhist monk. It is a sometimes loosely-linked compilation, comprising hagiographies of three wizzars, a biography of the medium through whom they speak, testimonials from devotees and a glossary. Its value is increased by the amount of detail provided: lists of participants in ceremonies, the prayers recited, the quantities of ingredients and offerings, the timing of rituals. We learn that much of the activity, including mysterious appearances and disappearances of wizzars and sometimes of their medium, takes place at night. We are told that the medium, U Tillaw Keinda, has in the past exhibited eccentric behaviour, attracted attempts at exorcism, and been jailed, as recently as 2004, following “nonsensical accusations.” The book tellingly emphasises that the wizzars never talk about politics or criticise the government.

At times the detail approaches the superfluous, or the narrative loses focus. Someone arrives uninvited at a ceremony in a Nissan car: we search in vain for the consequences and significance of this. But the description of the cult, the presentation of practices that are admitted to be outside the beliefs of “some orthodox Theravada practitioners,” is generally coherent in itself. Wonders of Mebegon Village is particularly significant as an anthropological and religious source because it provides material for comparison with the better-known cult activities centred around Bo Mingaung at the wizzar shrine complexes at Amarapura and Mount Popa, which E. Michael Mendelson introduced to English readers in the 1960s.

Bob Hudson

University of Sydney